

Coordination and Subordination

by Sophia

WHAT'S COVERED

In this lesson, you will learn how to effectively join clauses to form compound and complex sentences. Specifically, this lesson will cover:

1. Coordinating Conjunctions and Compound Sentences
2. Subordinating Conjunctions and Complex Sentences

1. Coordinating Conjunctions and Compound Sentences

Recall that there are two types of clauses: independent clauses, which can stand on their own as complete sentences, and dependent clauses, which cannot.

➞ EXAMPLE As you may remember from an earlier lesson, the clause "while he was tired" is a dependent clause because it does not express a complete thought.

There are two ways to make a dependent clause like "while he was tired" into a complete sentence. First, you could turn it into an independent clause and full sentence by completing the thought.

➞ EXAMPLE The dog was tired.

Here, "the dog" is the subject and "was" is the verb. Or you could use a type of conjunction called a coordinating conjunction to combine it with an independent clause, like this:

➞ EXAMPLE The dog sat in the doghouse, for he was tired.

Now, two clauses are combined with the conjunction "for." See how the addition of that independent clause ("The dog sat in the doghouse") to "for he was tired" allows a full thought to be expressed? A conjunction is a word or phrase that connects parts of a sentence, and a coordinating conjunction connects two independent clauses into a compound sentence, which is a sentence that contains two or more independent clauses.

Most of the time, a compound sentence will take two clauses that are somehow connected in their content and that are just about equally important to understanding the full thought.

➞ EXAMPLE I want to pet that dog. That dog has fleas.

In the first sentence above, "I" is the subject and "want" is the verb. In the second sentence, "dog" is the subject and "has" is the verb. These sentences offer two good pieces of information, and each tells the reader something important about the situation.

The clauses can be separate, but if joined together, they provide a better understanding of what is going on.

➞ EXAMPLE I want to pet that dog, but he has fleas.

Notice that these two clauses are now connected with a comma and the word "but," which is a coordinating conjunction.

IN CONTEXT

Using the acronym FANBOYS (For, And, Nor, But, Or, Yet, So) is a good way to remember all of these coordinating conjunctions. All of these words are common in English, even for connecting other words and phrases that are not clauses, and each means something really different, changing the implication of a sentence. When you are using a coordinating conjunction to make a compound sentence, you will need to select the correct one.

Take a closer look at each:

- For essentially means "because," which points to a cause-and-effect relationship between the two clauses that it connects.
- And tells us that whatever comes after it is going to add in more information that's relevant to the first clause.
- Nor is a negating word; it explains that the two clauses are "not," or introduces a clause that will be in the negative.
- But connects two clauses by pointing out that the second clause contradicts the first one in some way.
- Or offers options; it indicates that the reader can choose between the two ideas that the two clauses present.
- Yet works much like "but," but note that it means something very different when you see it outside of a compound sentence.
- So also describes cause-and-effect, but specifically indicates that the second clause will describe something that is the result of whatever the first clause says.

In the following sentences, notice that the coordinating conjunction changes when you want the meaning of the whole sentence to change. In each sentence, there is a clause, then a comma and a coordinating conjunction, and then the next clause:

- I like to pet dogs, and I also like to pet cats.

- I like to pet dogs, but I do not like to pet cats.
- I do not like to pet dogs, nor do I like to pet cats.
- I do not like to pet dogs, yet I like to pet cats.

In a compound sentence, the comma always comes before the coordinating conjunction. This doesn't mean that a coordinating conjunction should always be preceded by a comma, though.

Sometimes, a coordinating conjunction might be used to connect two words as opposed to connecting two independent clauses; therefore, this would not create a compound sentence.

➞ EXAMPLE The sentence "I could pet a dog or cat" uses a coordinating conjunction to connect two words.

TRY IT

Consider the following two sentences, and decide if they make sense.

All of the students wanted to pet the dog, yet the dog was happy to oblige.

All of the students wanted to pet the dog, and the dog was happy to oblige.

In the first sentence, the first clause indicates that everyone wanted to pet the dog, and the second clause indicates that the dog is happy about that situation. But when the two clauses are connected, the coordinating conjunction "yet" implies that the second clause negates, complicates, or even contradicts the first, which would mean that the students are not going to be able to pet the dog. The second sentence clears this up.

TRY IT

Now consider these two sentences, and decide if they make sense.

The students gathered around, and they could pet the dog.

The students gathered around, so they could pet the dog.

In the first sentence, the first clause has the students gathering together, and the second clause has them able to pet the dog. The coordinating conjunction "and" makes sense, but does it make a lot of sense? Is the relationship between the first and the second clause really clear? The second sentence clarifies that gathering around is meant to enable petting the dog, and these two clauses are more effectively connected, making the whole idea much clearer.

TERMS TO KNOW

Conjunction

A word or phrase that connects parts of a sentence.

Coordinating Conjunction

A conjunction that connects two independent clauses to form a compound sentence.

Compound Sentence

A sentence that contains two or more independent clauses.

2. Subordinating Conjunctions and Complex Sentences

A sentence that is composed of independent and dependent clauses is going to work a little differently than this. This type of sentence is called a complex sentence, in which one of the clauses is more important than the other.

➞ EXAMPLE I will buy presents for my friends because the holidays are soon.

This sentence starts with an independent clause with "I" as the subject and "will buy" as the verb. Then there is a dependent clause with its own subject and its own verb. The two clauses are connected with the subordinating conjunction "because."

A subordinating conjunction is a word or phrase that connects an independent and dependent clause. You've seen coordinating conjunctions, and now you have subordinating conjunctions.

Subordinating conjunctions are used in complex sentences because they indicate that the clause they precede is going to add in the necessary information to complete whatever thought the other clause has started. Some common subordinating conjunctions are "after," "although," "when," "while," and "until."

In some sentences, the subordinating conjunction is the first word, thus meaning the dependent clause comes first.

➞ EXAMPLE Since I brought my presents, I am ready for the holidays.

Also note that when the dependent clause is first, it's always followed by a comma before the independent clause. When the independent clause is first, there will not be a comma between clauses.

TERMS TO KNOW

Subordinating Conjunction

A conjunction that connects an independent clause to a dependent clause to form a complex sentence.

Complex Sentence

A sentence that contains both an independent clause and a dependent clause.

SUMMARY

In this lesson, you learned about the kinds of conjunctions you might use to connect clauses:

Coordinating conjunctions connect compound sentences, and subordinating conjunctions connect complex sentences. Now that you've played around with these different conjunctions in both kinds of sentences, you can expand your writing beyond simple sentences.

Best of luck in your learning!
